HONOR/CONDUCT CODE - JOHNS HOPKINS SCHOOL OF MEDICINE

Medical school education marks the passage of a person into the profession of medicine and the assumption of responsibility for conducting oneself in a manner befitting a physician. The virtues of integrity, trustworthiness, and honesty are all essential attributes of a good physician and medical scientist. They form the basis of the relationship between the physician and his or her patients and peers. Part of the educational process for physicians must therefore include behavior consistent with that expected of physicians. The honor code sets forth the School of Medicine's expectations regarding the manner in which students will conduct themselves and requires each student to acknowledge these expectations in a formal declaration of personal honor.

As a student at The Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, I pledge:

To do my own work and be honest in my interactions with peers, faculty, and staff. This applies to my work on examinations, assignments, and papers as well as work in the laboratory.

To uphold the high standard of conduct in patient care which has always been maintained by the Johns Hopkins medical community.

To base my interactions with others on mutual respect and cooperation and not engage in any behavior that causes or threatens to harm others.

To act on infractions of the honor code, and to maintain the confidentiality of all parties involved.

To encourage my peers to uphold this honor code.
